

ANNOTATED CRITICAL COMPANIONSHIP REFERENCES

(In date order to show developments over several decades. Therefore, the quickest way to find a particular reference that has been cited in the website material, might be searching for the date first!

)

Although many of these references focus on critical companionship within nursing contexts (because that is where it was originally developed), subsequent research and experience demonstrates that it is transferable to other health and social professions and contexts.

The references are divided into four parts:

- Critical companionship
- Consultancy practice, person-centred systems & processes
- Stepping into critical-creative ways of working holistically with body, imagination and metaphysical
- Demonstrating impact

Critical companionship

Caplan, G (1970) The Theory and Practice of Mental Health Consultation Tavistock, London .

(Caplan's consultancy model identifies four levels of consultancy practice which is process focussed. The first two levels focus on direct and indirect everyday practice where practitioners first act as a consultant to patients and service users (client centred consultancy) but also to each other reflecting how the interdisciplinary team can benefit from the expertise of different professions (consultee - centred) to inform the care provided. The second two levels is programme/ system focused where direct expertise is provided through consultancy to the programme or system (programme-centred administrative consultancy) and indirect consultancy focuses on supporting a consultee who is implementing a programme or activity)

She found that holistic facilitation, that enables 'muchness' and well-being, is vital to creating person-centred cultures and contexts at micro, meso and macro levels. Such facilitation involves a 'full life' understanding of well-being and what matters to people. This work is an exemplar of embodied, embedded research see Sanders et al (2021).*
